In he report before us the author has addres ed himself to the economic study of the geograpical position of the State, with the especial view of pointing out its commercial advantages, its bearing upon the common defense, and the naional importance which it gives to its two grand lines of internal Improve ment which are designed to connect the Western States with its seaport towns. These advantages," says the author, are so pervading that other States, with the nation at large, are as much intercated in turning them to account as Virginle is berself. Naturally, and both in a geographical and military point of view, Norfolk with Hampton Roads, at the mouth of Chesapeaks Bay, as its lower narbor, and San Francisco inside of the Golden Gate in California occupy-one on the Pacific, the other on the Atlautic-the most important mariime positions that his within the fomain of the United States, olds the commanding point on lia cesat; each has the floest harbor on the onst, and each with the most convenient ingress and agress for its ships, is as safe from wind and wave as shelter can make them. Nor is access to either ever interrupted by the frees of winter. In the harbors of each there is water and room to berth not only all the ships of commerce but the nuvies of the world. The author reviews the two oceans in heir commercial aspects, in a short but omprehensive chapter as a sort of introfactory before proceeding to the main ject of the report—the gaugraphical sition and internal improvements of the State (Virginia). The report is illustrated with three large, accurate and handsomely gotten up maps. The first is a colored map of Virginia, on a scale of fifteen miles to the tues, compiled from Ludwig's map and more recent dates. The secchart of the steam line between Norfolk and Flushing, showing the back country geographically tribulary to each, and the internal improvements connected therewith. The third is a colored map of the United States, constructed on the reetsugular tangential projection, to a ecale of a half inch to one degree on the quator-all of them gotten up under the direction of Professor Maury.

We look with interest for a continuation of the reports and a completion of this great work -a work for which Vir ginia could have found no more fitting man than him who now was it in charge.
